Christmas on the Plains

A Walk in the Woods

Tell me the difference in women and men. A chromosome. And something else. Between a romantic and casual heart. The temperature at which it melts.

Between the secular and the zealous. The literate person as a rule is not zealous; the zealous is not literate. Either can be a fool.

Between important and trivial things. If you would like to want to live forever go read Woolf and Why and Stans and Hardy and time will forgive the time you spent on Sunday puzzles. Or, if you're sad at doing so soon, go sit in front of the television from breakfast till five in the afternoon.

In times that were and times that are. The streets were not so young and wild and people sat on porches and every adult was the parent of every child.

A lawyer knew Latin if not the law. A doctor would not just cure a disease but heal the patient. Lawyers wore galleons. We were in awe of their degrees.

In left and right. They both believe in greater freedom. They disagree only on the finer point of what it means to be free.

In us and others. They look at us from places we can never stand. In you and me. Ah, my child, we've wandered longer than I had planned.
